My first thought was to buy a pressure tank and use the accumulator design to create a pneumatic pressure source. Then, a simple voltage regulator would take the generated pressure, and convert it to a voltage output. While this does work, it doesn’t convert all of the energy. I’ve also been thinking that an electric motor might be able to take compressed air, and power an AC voltmeter while reversing. Can anyone provide any input about repurposing pneumatic power systems for new purposes? How do these new systems fail safe? What about the environments used for their systems? Edit: I have to mention that a standard compressor would not be enough in this situation. This is an old forklift. The compresor has been welded shut, and I only need a little compressed air. I have access to an old one. If this isn't possible I have to ask, what else can I do. A: In addition to the others, I think you can use a bio-gas generator to generate an internal pressure source from CO2. High pressure-gradient catheter tip for intra-
